Extended Abstract

1. INTRODUCTION
This study is going to explore the effects of cultural tourism. It emphasizes on the rich cultural heritage of rural areas, like shaikh Kolini in Fashafouieh. Also, this research explores the domination of cultural tourism in this area beside other types of tourism and also tourism effects on rural areas is going to be discussed.

2. THEORTICAL FRAMEWORK
Primarily, places have various functions on the base of their different nature, such as economic, social, political and cultural roles. These characteristic can play the role of attraction in tourism industry. It shapes Cultural tourism which is getting more important these days, and represents a significant source of attraction for tourists (both domestic and by its rich historical heritage. At the same time, rural tourism is one of the most common types of tourism, which along with numerous benefits for the rural community; it harms the community's identity at different stages. Also, it has a most resemblance with local culture and it has the ability to become the most popular tourism worldwide (OECD, 2009). One of the consequences of the interaction of tourism in rural areas is changing or distorting international relations). Such aspect seems particularly relevant for a country like Iran, which is internationally renowned for its abundance of historical and cultural resources, as shown of local cultures and traditional subcultures in rural areas, that has led to a lack of interest in the host community towards tourism development in their villages.

In contrast, the cultural tourism which its product is associated with one or more of the specific cultural and religious phenomena, has more attraction for the specific customers (tourists) as compared to other types of tourists (ecotourism, tourism, agriculture, etc.) that have a greater congruence with the people in their host community. Several studies have investigated whether or not WHS endowment or more generally cultural offer increases tourism demand. However, the empirical evidence is mixed on this issue. A number of studies claim that the cultural heritage and attractions of a country are important determinants of tourism demand.

3. METHODOLOGY
The research method in this study is applied and analytical. The data has been collected through field investigations. The focus groups are women and men who live in 4 villages in this area and the data has been gathered through questionnaire from sample of 170 families of local communities and 70 tourists from Kolain Village. The questionnaire was primarily developed based on 5-point Likert scale, which addressed the quality of tourism development and has been analysed by Ultimate statistical test. The research validity was determined through formal method, so that the questionnaire was approved after several stages of review by experts in tourism. For completing the initial information by advisory method the rural council and mayors have been interviewed. Cronbach's alpha formula was used to determine the reliability coefficient amount of questions which was calculated as 0.801 for a group of local people and was 0.832 for the tourists. The study relies on a variable-based cultural tourism. To explore the impact of cultural tourism, five indicators have been used that appeared as three cultural, economic and social factors which are exploring about the demands and the specific effects of tourism in the region. In the next stage, data were classified and coded by using Spss software. For answering the research questions and assessing the meaningfulness of the impact of

From the researcher aspect, visiting the villages and collecting the data from local people need more patience and it is a time consuming project. The research indicated that despite of many deficiencies in facilities, this type of tourism has less negative effects on local communities. The research also revealed that 99% of the tourists in the study area are satisfied. It seems that local people are more willing to host the tourists that respect to their culture and consider the values of the community.

The results indicate that there is a satisfaction from tourism too, due to the cultural proximity between local community and tourists which visit shrine, this condition happens despite of many shortages in tourism services and facilities. So, based on the research results, it is recommended that development of Culture-Oriented has more potential for developing of tourism in the rural areas.

5. CONCLUSION
This research shows a new approach to social exchange theory which looks at the exchange profits, not only from economical and financial benefits but with an emphasis on spiritual and religious interests and attitudes on the base of historical and cultural identity of local community.

Key words: Rural tourism, social exchange theory, culture-oriented tourism, tourism impacts, local community, Iran.
